Acting together in a world on the move

The aspiration to ‘leave no-one behind’ and to reach the furthest behind first cannot be met without understanding who faces the greatest inequalities and risks to their human rights, and therefore who is most likely to be systematically disadvantaged at the various stages of mobility. It means recognising that each of the estimated 258 million migrants worldwide brings their own resilience and resources while at the same time facing their own individual circumstances and vulnerabilities, which must be comprehensively addressed in the Global Compact for Migration.
